Sometimes as a young man in your prime, you have to accept the fact that some senior citizens can run faster than you.

Morne La Croix or ("mountain of the cross", to the English speakers) was an intense two part run which left most hashers feeling crucified in the end.

The first half of the run took off at Mid-Way Bar, which was rightfully named because it was smack dab between Blanchisseuse and Arima. At about 3:45pm everyone was gathered awaiting the command from the lead Hare. We were all eager to run after the long winding road to get here. Slowly, a large dark cloud approached us much to the delight of seasoned Hashers and to the dismay of virgins. In the crowd you could hear the whispers; are we going to run in this weather? Are raincoats available? There was a mischievous grin on the hares faces as they looked for hash pofter nominees.

The hash started. 'On On' we went following one of the hares in the direction of Blanchisseuse up a slight incline. Then down we went on a trail to the mountains. Even further down a muddy trail which turned into a mudslide (not the drink) claiming its victims as we pushed on passed each other. We continued through a yard with fig sucklings which are not the best thing to hold on to when you are falling. As I hash more and more I realise how deep in the "bush", some people live. But anyway, in we went, now surrounded by beautiful green forest. Being ever mindful of those damn pricks ('thorns or pickers' to the dirty minded) and they were everywhere. Eventually we came to a river, which is a nice way to cool off, as you run through. This is also where you get the chance to pass some hashers in your way. The ones that are afraid to get their feet wet. Then we went uphill, which was not as bad as the 'Tetrun', an awesome glute workout at the least. Down again and out though someone's back yard; our trespassing with permission?

A tough 45 minutes later and we were out at the bar. An end for those who were spent and a beer stop for those who dared to continue. We headed in the opposite direction downhill to our relief in search of the trail, we found that we were in a construction zone where pipe works was going on. Other Hashers were seen running back down a hill to meet us. Then 'On Back' shouted Ivan, 'a nice way to bring a Hash back together'. Up we ran, then a right through the bush again. We ran over and under, around and through, as we manoeuvred around nature's obstacles. Finally as they had promised, the climb! Up we went, on a mountain that seemed to have no end. Runners turned to walkers as we fought our way up. All of a sudden there was a pipe; who the heck ran this pipe and where does it lead to? Looking out not to burst it because no one would have liked the task to fix it. Finally reaching the misty top, appeared a random latrine. It was in the perfect location just in case nature called. Down with speed to make up lost time, to see the end. The arrow pointing us in the direction of the finish, then an all out sprint.

After the hash you could see all the tired but happy faces as another run was conquered. Hashers were greeting their friends after the gruelling second half. The local bar was busy passing out cold beers. And the food! Hmm nothing beats country cooking. Opposite the bar was a stand pipe where many first time users cleaned up a bit for the "down down". A fitting way to end your Saturday!

HM's High Stepping

As an un-inhibited hasher you are no doubt given to the pursuit of happiness. Such happiness is ultimately yours in the making. Of course we are helped along our journey by the provisions made on any given Saturday when we gather to ritualize our existence.

Today we were presented with some unrelenting virgin territory that made the deep trek to Morne La Croix worth it. A fantastic run set by the hares; unfortunately too much for most of those opting out at the halfway point. The crowd was huge, for a village of that size, and the early torrential downpour doing nil to dampen the gathering's ebullient demeanor. We were even lucky to be graced with a guest of status par excellence. Well done Morne La Croix – take a bow.
